- Just as slavery was the central and distinguishing feature of American society before the Civil War, the modern prison system, which was largely an American innovation, has ever since the Civil War been evolving into a central institution of contemporary America. Indeed, today the prison-industrial complex is a feature that distinguishes American society from all other societies in the twenty-first century. So if we teach modern American literature without reference to the American prison and its literature, we are behaving like those who failed to see, hear, or speak about slavery and its literature.

- H. Bruce Franklin

The dramatic number of people locked up in American prisons in the last quarter of the 20th-century has been widely documented. By 2000, the rate of incarceration surpassed 700 per 100,000 people, a percentage, as Loïc Wacquant notes, "about 40 per cent higher than South Africa's at the height of the armed struggle against apartheid." In our state of West Virginia, the number of people imprisoned since 1997 has increased 95%. For some, the imprisonment of two million people and the additional five million living under some other form of state surveillance suggests a reprehensible method of population control and repression, one that disproportionately impacts poor people and Black, Hispanic, and Native Americans. For others, the increase in the prison population and surveillance mechanisms is a reasonable response to criminal behavior, a sign that the state is tough on crime and willing to use its resources to punish offenders.

This course is rooted in prison studies, an interdisciplinary approach to understanding the complex history and cultural function of prisons. Like Black Studies and Women's Studies, prison studies emerges from specific social crises and a determination to make academic courses relevant to struggles for justice. We will confront fundamental questions about literary and cultural work, such as, What constitutes the field of prison literature, and why? What does art have to do with prisons? How should prison literature be situated within the larger field of American literature? Has literature by or about prisoners played a role in public policy decisions, changes in prison administration, or judicial processes? Why have criminal investigations, interrogations, and trials become such a popular feature of American entertainment?

As we read literary texts, we will also draw from history, philosophy, sociology, sexuality studies, narrative theories, and critical race theories to help us contextualize and analyze multiple operations of power. In Part One, we will study the history of prisons and prison writing by reading works by, among others, Michel Foucault, David Oshinsky, H. Bruce Franklin, and Joy James. In Part Two, we will turn to the dominant genre in prison literature, autobiography. These works testify to personal transformations inside and outside prison walls. The literary works in Part Three will prompt us to examine the specific complications of imprisoned sexual and gendered bodies. We will also discuss the borders of prison culture: What practices, ideologies, personal dynamics are similar inside and out? What “prisons” exist in the “free” world? In Part Four, we will study capital punishment, reading three plays, a novel, and essays written in support and against state killing. In each section, we will attend to recurring narrative, theoretical, and dramatic concerns, such as the treatment of time and space; trauma, crime, punishment; faith and religion; class, race, and gender. We will conclude the semester with a brief section on war and torture “revelations,” or what has been called “the prison nation abroad.”

I want to say a word about the politics of this course. I am not neutral about our current prison system nor about the death penalty. I oppose the death penalty in all cases, and I believe that the prison system creates indefensible suffering for many families and individuals. Most prisoners in the US are serving time for nonviolent drug-related offenses. (Some people believe that all drug offenses are violent, but I am using the legal definition of “nonviolent” here.) The perception that most prisoners are dangerous people who are a threat to public safety is, in my estimation, a false one. I also know that the suffering of murder and rape victims, and the agony experienced by their family and friends, is almost unspeakable. To focus on the abuses of the state with regard to prisoners does not require that we ignore or diminish the consequences of violent crimes. Indeed, there is a model for this kind of thinking in the contemporary anti-death penalty movement, which brings together prisoners’ and victims’ advocates, family members of people who have been executed by the state and family members of people who have been murdered.

My sense that basic human rights are being routinely violated in American prisons will, I suspect, be clear to you. I am not, however, interested in a one-sided, static, and settled conversation. I am going to work hard to create a vital dialogue about difficult personal, social, and political questions, and to craft a scholarly environment in which we can respectfully challenge one another as well as our reading materials. The study of literature teaches us to attend to the complexity of situations. Imprisonment is complex. So is liberation. We need to start reading.

Richard Wright, Native Son (1940; unabridged edition 1991)

Requirements

Reader Responses

On our listserve, everyone will post at least five responses (approximately 500-750 words) to our readings. You should choose one idea, question, image, or scene from our weekly readings to focus on. Be sure to include quotations in your analysis. Pace your responses throughout the semester and try to post by at least 4PM on Sunday, so we all have a chance to read the responses before we meet. Please bring to class a single-spaced, hard copy for me. Our listserve can also serve for follow-up discussions and announcements.

One of these responses can be a creative response to our readings. That is, you might compose a letter to an author or a character, examining some question that you have. Or you might compose a scene that takes place before or after a moment in a literary text—a scene that conveys your understanding of the original text. Any creative, engaged, thoughtful writing is welcome.

Essays

You will compose two essays (10-12 pages) in which you pursue a theoretical, historical, philosophical, and/or critical literary question. For the first essay, I will collect annotated bibliographies (approx. 10 sources) and abstracts about two weeks before the due date. For the second essay, I will again collect abstracts and proposals, but we will also have a full draft exchange. (I have set aside class time for writing workshops for both assignments.) I will invite each of you to meet with me in a conference to discuss your ideas. Anyone who would like in the second assignment to follow up on the first essay and compose a 20-25 page essay is welcome to do so.

In order to compile a useful annotated bibliography, you will need to skim a number of articles and books, and glean the main subject, approach, range and depth of the research. Each entry should be about 150 words. Use MLA style for the citation. See this website for more information on abstracts and annotated bibliographies. <http://www.library.cornell.edu/olinuris/ref/research/skill28.htm>

Resident Expert

Everyone will have a chance to be a Resident Expert for one class period. On your assigned day, you will have the option of either a) guiding the first thirty minutes of our discussion, or b) offering a ten-minute presentation at the beginning of class. In either case, you will create an annotated bibliography (approx. 8 - 10 sources) that focuses on a specific aspect of our reading for that week. Please bring copies to class for everyone. In your presentation, you should focus on one aspect of our readings. Do not feel like you need to cover everything. Also, do not simply take us through the annotated bibliography, but rather draw from your research in creative ways to launch our discussion. Email and let me know which option you will be pursuing at least two days before we meet.

Grade Breakdown

Two Essays (10 - 12 pp)	60%
Five Responses (500 - 750 words)	20%
